[Copyright, 1901, by C. B. Lewis.] Were a boy 10 or 12 years of age to encounter a full grown gorilla in a cornfield late at night the struggle might be a terrific one, but that boy would be advertised as missing next morning. Of all wild beasts to be feared by man the gorilla inspires the most dread. If he were to be found in America in such numbers as in Africa, no farmer's son would go sparking on Sunday night for love or money, and spelling schools, cornhuskings and apple bees would have to take place in the afternoon.

The home of the gorilla is in central Africa, and he is boss in his own territory. In the picture I have drawn you see an elephant lying supinely on his side in the forest, while a gorilla dances up and down on his body. The elephant had sought to crowd the gorilla off the sidewalk as they met, but was seized by his tusks and given the flop.

While the tion has his good natured moments and the elephant will often take a great deal of sass before he breaks loose, the gorilla is fighting mad from Sunday morning to Saturday night. He is never placid or complacent, but is ever itching to give some one a swipe on the jaw. He is probably the only thing on earth that will get out of a warm bed at midnight to fight the yeawl of a cat or the hoot of an owl. It is this pepper sauce temper of his that gives him such a great advantage over his fellow wild beasts. He has them licked before they can get madand ready to fight. If you will take notice of a gorilla in a menageric, you will discover that his face carries a grin. He looks like a man who would back a note for a friend or sign a petition for a new sidewalk, but there is where you are fooled in him. Under that grin is concealed enough cayenne pepper to warm up a whole village.

What the fate of the gorilla will be no one can way. He may never be educated up to the point of running a ward caucus or carrying the American flag from New York to San Francisco, but If he could be taught to turn a grindstone, husk corn, shell beans and kill cats the world would give him welcome and secondhand clothes.
